

Globalism, Regionalism And Nationalism: Asia In Search Of Its Role In The Twenty-first Century

APEC, ASEAN+3, and American Power:

The History and Limits of the New Regionalism in the Asia-Pacific

Mark T. Berger and Mark Beeson

INTRODUCTION: "EAST ASIA" OR THE "ASIA-PACIFIC"

The post-Cold War era has seen the simultaneous acceleration of economic regionalisation and increased levels of transnational political interaction associated with regionalism. In the 1990s both non-state-centred and state-centred regional processes of integration have emerged as increasingly important counterpoints to the globalisation project and US globalism.¹ In fact, some observers have argued that regional ¹ Björn Hettne, "Globalisation and the new regionalism: The second great transformation", in Björn, et al (eds.), Globalism and the New Regionalism (London: Macmillan, 1999). The globalisation project, as the term is used here, is centred on the promotion of neo-liberalism and the reconfiguration of state-mediated national development projects into neo-liberal states and is being pursued at a wide range of sites by an increasingly unaccountable transnationalised elite. The globalisation project is linked, in particular, to the growing concentration of control over the global economy by a relatively small number of large oligopolistic transnational corporations that have emerged in the 1990s from dramatic merger-driven and technology-facilitated changes to the global political economy. Despite the increasingly oligopolistic character of global business operations the globalisation project is legitimated by, and promoted in the name of, a "free enterprise" vision of the global economy. Regionalization and globalisation, building on Payne and Gamble are defined as primarily non-state-centred processes, while regionalism and globalism are primarily state-led processes, the latter being associated particularly with the U.S. and the Soviet Union during the Cold War, and with the US in the post-Cold War era. Of course, the boundaries between these processes is not always clear.
