A Vertical Case Study of Global Policy-Making: Early Grade Literacy in Zambia

Lesley Bartlett and Frances Vavrus

The vertical case study offers a multi-level, multi-sited approach to educational policy research. As illustrated elsewhere (e.g. Bartlett and Vavrus 2014; Vavrus and Bartlett 2012, 2013), a vertical case study traces the course by which policy is formulated and appropriated across space and time by groups of actors in distinct assemblages. One of its goals is to analyze how particular understandings of educational problems are produced and become "globalized" through multilateral policy-making institutions, while simultaneously exploring how these understandings are "localized" by social actors in different locations. In this chapter, we look specifically at the "problem" of early grade literacy, and how it gets articulated in one specific place: Zambia. We show how Critical Discourse Analysis (CDA), which illuminates the way the global literacy agenda is established, can be used in vertical case study research in ways that productively connect the study of global policy-making and national or local educational policy-as-practice. CDA, we contend, provides for a more refined analysis of policy discourse than one frequently finds in the study of global policy because it hones in on the building blocks of discourse, namely, the words and phrases that cohere to produce broader meanings and representations in a social field. Unlike our previous illustrations of vertical case studies that have included a substantial ethnographic component, we focus in this chapter on CDA as an important methodological tool for global policy analysis; in the conclusion, we outline the essential qualitative, multi-site fieldwork that could be done to elaborate a vertical case study of early grade literacy in Zambia.
